You can make design changes to your web image by using one of Photoshop's preset modes or by creating your own modes. Photoshop's Modify Mode can be found in the menu at the bottom of your Photoshop window. 2. From the Modify menu, choose Desaturate to make all the colors in the image grayscale (seeFigure 7-2). If you apply the Desaturate filter more than once, the second, third, and so on filters change the colors of the image to grayscale, as shown in Figure 7-2. 3. Double-click the Mask icon to create a new empty layer on top of the Desaturate layer. 4. Use the paintbrush tool to fill the mask with black so that the black will show up against the rest of the picture. Select either the Rectangular or Elliptical tool and then paint over the areas where the change is to be applied. Use the selection tools to zoom in to make a fine selection. See the "Covering with a selection" section later in this chapter for more details on how to work with selections. 5. Leave the Desaturate layer active and double-click the Layer Mask icon to hide it from view and bring the layer back into view. 6. Fill the new layer with black using the paintbrush tool. The black fills only those pixels in the mask that were black before you applied the Desaturate filter. 7. Repeat Steps 2 through 6 for other filters. For example, choose the Hue/Saturation filter to make the colors in your picture red, the colorize filter to make colors orange, and the Curves filter to lighten

A recent research study of female gamers by the University of Toronto has found that playing video games is helping girls to learn how to control their emotions. This is the result of a study with over 300 girls from grade 7 to grade 10. The study used the “Academic Orientation and Emotion Control Scale” to assess their emotion control and their ability to control their emotions. The study found that girls who play video games in moderation, i.e. 75 per cent of their leisure time, have a better ability to control their emotions than the other girls. The researchers said that girls who play more than 75 per cent of their leisure time tend to have a better ability to control their emotions than those who do not play games at all. Another conclusion from the study is that the participants who played games for a long period of time were able to have a better ability to control their emotions as compared to those who played the game for a shorter period of time. “The more girls play video games, the better their ability to control their emotions,” said University of Toronto psychology professor Jennifer Chatfield. Chatfield said that this is the result of the “video game immersion.” The immersion, as she described, is when the girls became interested in the games and started to spend a lot of time playing them. This is where they become so engrossed in their games that they have a hard time getting their parents’ permission to stop. Chatfield, who studies the psychology of video games, said that the video game immersion is one of the fundamental reasons why video games help girls to control their emotions. “Playing video games helps girls to simulate the emotions that they usually experience when they are in their games,” she said. The researchers said that this factor is very important. Many parents worry that their daughters will become more vulnerable to emotional symptoms such as anxiety or depression. However, Chatfield said that this is not true. Instead, the playtime becomes a time when the girls can change how they are in the real world. They get to change the way they talk to their parents and friends. Reflections on the 2018 MRC Ph.D. in Behavior Change Summit. The 2018 MRC Ph.D. in Behavior Change Summit was a unique opportunity for MRC researchers to meet, share knowledge and expertise, collaborate, and form new collaborations.
