I know if I was more of a solitary type, I'd get plenty of chances to hit the beach solo. But I like doing things with others, regardless of when or where. It helps me stay balanced. And so, it was something of a surprise (and a great relief) to me when I heard that the International Coastal Cleanup was being co-hosted at a local beach near where I live. Co-sponsored by the University of Washington, the work of the International Coastal Cleanup (ICC) depends on volunteers. According to ICC's website, some four million people from 300 countries participated in 2006. That includes people from all over the United States, and many of them have been participating in ICC events since the early '90s. So I knew when I arrived at the beach that morning, I would be expected to help out. People from all over the world have always come together to help clean our beaches and waterways. But ICC is distinctive, and this year's event will be the first one that's been held in the Pacific Northwest. It's also one of the few that's been co-hosted by a university. Take a look at ICC's website, and you'll see that this is a serious undertaking. The site has information on what to do, and what to do about various types of garbage, including plastic, and the site also has information on cleaning up landfills. Beach or not beach, I knew I had a job to do. But first I had to find out where the beach was. It wasn't easy. The event started at 9 AM, and it was still dark. This is one of the things I enjoyed: the solitude of a dark, peaceful night. I started at 3.30 AM, picking up plastic. It was something of a struggle to find the solid plastic, but I did eventually find a few. It was easy to see that the plastic was intact. That's because heavy plastic floats. The plastic bags and cans — which are not the most dangerous type of garbage, according to ICC — had been washed up on the shore by the rising tide. The wind would have whipped the plastic into a handful of masses of beach debris. The plastic sure looked so clean, at least for now. If left unattended and undisturbed, plastic tends to

We are involved in a long-term collaboration with Dr. Myriam Kalberer, M.D., Professor of Medicine at Duke University Medical Center. Her long-term goal is to establish and study the therapeutic effect of a natural drug candidate in the treatment of diabetes. The major focus of her study is to examine the role of macrophages and cytokines in the control of insulin production by pancreatic beta cells. We have demonstrated that macrophages accumulate in the diabetic pancreas and are involved in a severe proinflammatory diabetogenic cytokine dysregulation. We have also shown that this macrophage-derived proinflammatory cytokine dysregulation is an intrinsic property of the macrophages and that it is a key component of the diabetic phenotype. We now propose to examine the therapeutic potential of a natural product, quercetin, which is known to modulate immune responses and has been shown to have potent anti-inflammatory activity. In addition, we now have evidence that this drug can modulate in vivo cytokine production by macrophages and beta cells. We therefore propose to examine the hypothesis that improving the diabetogenic cytokine dysregulation will improve beta cell function and improve glycemic control in diabetes. The specific aims are: (1) to examine the effect of macrophage-induced proinflammatory cytokine dysregulation on insulin production and beta cell function in vitro and in vivo; (2) to assess the effect of altered cytokine dysregulation on beta cell function and glucose homeostasis in diabetes; and (3) to examine the effect of quercetin on macrophage cytokine production and beta cell function. Elucidating the mechanisms of macrophage-induced diabetogenic cytokine dysregulation may lead to the development of new treatments for diabetes.Digital Prototypes: Choosing a Star Sequence Digital Prototypes: Choosing a Star Sequence Introduction Prototyping has been one of the most useful, and yet one of the most misunderstood, techniques in visual storytelling. Digital Prototypes (DP) have been the chosen method in creating film sequences for over twenty-five years, and in this guide I'll show you how they do it. I'll explain how and why DPs have become the most effective way of visual storytelling, and hopefully, after reading this guide you'll understand why and how they work. Getting Started "When we talk about "be like water" we usually
