Q: Setting up a Windows MSI package on a colleague's machine I'm involved in setting up a Windows MSI package on a colleague's machine, since we are based on the Azure platform there are quite a few dependencies, for example I need SQL Server Express 2015 which needs Wireshark and other tools. My colleague doesn't really know what is happening to his machine and questions start from "it won't work". I would like to know the best approach for setting up such a package and how to manage a set-up of that sort. A: You have to separate the parts of your package. You don't have to deliver all parts together. You can deliver only the parts needed for your colleague. At least the parts from the prerequisites. At the end of the process your colleague can separate the parts which are not required for him. I assume you are developing the MSI using a script. To support your colleague you need to deliver the script or a setup with all required dependencies, as I said in the beginning, separated. In order to develop such an installer you can use my batch-library (part of my MSI package: msitools) which makes everything much easier. { d0c515b9f4

Interactions between nematodes and Pseudomonas aeruginosa in the soil-plant-nematode system. Interactions between the aquatic, free-living nematode, Aporcelaimellus tumescens, and the soil microorganisms Pseudomonas aeruginosa, Rhizobium rubi, Azotobacteriaceae and Paenibacillus polymyxa were studied in the soil-plant-nematode system. Bacterial adherence to nematodes was monitored with a fluorescein isothiocyanate (FITC) labeling procedure, while bacterial-nematode interactions were determined by incubation of nematodes on agar plates or on gels supplemented with individual bacteria. Chemical analysis of soil sterilized with chemical and gamma-radiation indicated the presence of compounds that inhibit the growth of nematodes. The activity of the compounds on bacterial strains was established by minimal inhibitory concentration (MIC) determinations. Growth inhibition of Pseudomonas aeruginosa by several soil compounds was observed and was specific for this microorganism. No significant inhibition was seen for Rhizobium and Paenibacillus species. Rhizobium rubi was the only Pseudomonas aer
