Combined application of a combinatorial enzymatic hydrolysis and kinetic modelling is a promising method for the optimization of enzymatic hydrolysates. However, application of existing kinetic models to the hydrolysis of complex substrate mixtures, such as natural substrates, is challenging because the concentration profiles in the hydrolysis are often very different from each other. In this study, we propose a modelling approach in which the concentration profiles are used as constraints on the model instead of initial concentration values. Based on an experimentally measured hydrolysis curve of glycosidically bonded pectin, the validity of this approach was first demonstrated for the optimization of enzymatic hydrolysates with respect to their concentration profiles. In addition, the feasibility of the approach was tested in the hydrolysis of konjac glucomannan, a complex substrate with four glycosidically bonded units. By simultaneously constraining the product concentration profiles for 15 enzymes and 10 reaction conditions, the optimum parameter sets for each enzyme could be determined. Thus, the proposed approach is not only useful for the optimisation of enzymatic hydrolysates, but also for the study of the dynamics of process-characteristic systems. Improved estimates of HIV prevalence in Kibaha District, Tanzania. To assess the likelihood that our HIV prevalence estimate of 9.2% among pregnant women in Kibaha District was an underestimate and to assess what evidence might suggest whether the previous estimates of HIV prevalence among pregnant women were overestimated. We calculated the following estimates of HIV prevalence among pregnant women in Kibaha District and non-pregnant women of reproductive age: (1) the probability that HIV prevalence among pregnant women in Kibaha District was less than that in the non-pregnant age group using the 2008 WHO multi-population survey; (2) the probability that HIV prevalence among the general population of Kibaha District was less than that of the non-pregnant age group using the 2008 WHO multi-population survey; (3) the probability that HIV prevalence among pregnant women in Kibaha District in 1991 was less than that in non-pregnant women of reproductive age using the 1991 Zanzibar HIV Sero-survey; and (4) the probability that HIV prevalence among pregnant women in Kibaha District in 1991 was less than that of non-pregnant women of reproductive age using the 1991 Zanzibar HIV Sero-survey. The most likely explanation for the difference in the HIV prevalence estimates was that pregnant women and non-pregnant women of reproductive age were not captured in the same household, which would not happen if HIV prevalence among pregnant women was much higher than that in non-pregnant women. The maximum estimates of HIV prevalence among pregnant women in Kibaha District and the general population in Kibaha District were 9.3% and 5.3% respectively, and the maximum estimates of the HIV prevalence in 1991 among pregnant women and non-pregnant women of reproductive age were 5.5% and 10.2% respectively. The difference in the HIV prevalence estimates between pregnant women and non-pregnant women of reproductive age in Kibaha District was due to the fact that pregnant women were not captured in the same household as non-pregnant women and was therefore an underestimate. We have estimated that the prevalence of HIV among pregnant women in Kibaha District was 9.3%. More studies using methods that account for this bias in household structure are needed in all locations to produce more reliable estimates of HIV prevalence among pregnant women. Q: Serving static folder in Laravel returns no content My Laravel controller's action is to serve a public folder and in my public folder I have a.jpg image. When I go to the action in the Laravel controller I get no content, even though the image is there in the public folder. Laravel Controller: `image();` } | HTML Form: `{ { method_field('POST') } }` Choose image Route: `Route::post('store', 'StoreController@store');` If anyone knows the answer, please let me know. A: If you were using an older version of Laravel that doesn't use Blade for templating, or if you don't have the `url()` helper, you could try using the `file()` helper instead: `public function store() { $user = new User; return \File::get(storage_path('app/public'), '/'. $user->image); }` You can also use the `url()` helper: `public function store() { $user = new User; return \Storage::url($user->image); }` And of course, you could use the `path()` helper (like in your question): `public function store() { $user = new User; return File`
