A vertical axis wind turbine that may harvest wind, has various advantages, such as higher efficiency than a horizontal axis wind turbine, and a larger output than a horizontal axis wind turbine, because a wind force is not mitigated or lost while the wind turbine is rotating, and a high output may be generated even in low-speed winds because the wind turbine has a small scale and is compact. The vertical axis wind turbine is manufactured by a method of fabricating a main body with a hub, that functions as a power generating mechanism, and a yawing drive, that drives the hub through a yawing motor, and a method of additionally mounting a yawing drive on the main body, and the yawing drive is attached to a main body using a screw. In the case of attaching the yawing drive to the main body using a screw, a screwing process for inserting the yawing drive into the main body is largely complicated, and it is difficult to accurately attach a power generating mechanism in a direction perpendicular to the drive shaft. As a result, noise is generated while the yawing drive passes through the main body.
