“We’ve applied the power of the physics engine to allow us to more accurately simulate the player’s presence,” said Alex Evans, Senior Gameplay Engineer. “In a first-person game like FIFA 22, the player can now run directly through an opponent, fall backwards when getting hit by a ball, and react to a through ball and in-and-out passes as realistically as possible.” The massive amount of data acquired through motion capture will also be helpful to the industry, as it will provide a template that developers can use to build their own systems. The technology behind the motion capture suits also captures accurate movement data that can be used in motion capture studios to study and analyze players’ patterns of movement. “We’ve created a game-ready data set that is ideal to build technical demos and professional analysis systems. The benefits from this technology have also led us to create the Academy of Motion Picture Arts and Sciences (AMPAS) Avatar: The Real Player,” said Markus Greegen, Senior Software Engineer for the game physics. A particle system is also a fully parametric engine that enables the AI to create the illusion of player behaviour. “We’ve improved how players negotiate their movement through the world, and made their interactions with the environment and other players more realistic,” said Mark Thompson, Senior Gameplay Engineer. “Players have a greater ability to swap between play styles and pass, tackle, shoot and dribble with more authenticity.” Using the “Repel” feature, players can now control the AI’s reactions to a challenge, providing a bit of strategy to the battles to come. For example, while the enemy is waiting to attack the defender, the AI player can try and disrupt the formation or attack the ball first. When protecting a player, the AI will take advantage of their team tactics and abilities. For example, a defensive midfielder will put pressure on the attacker from his cover shadow, forcing the attacker to make space or make a mistake. Traffic and water physics are also improved, with new features like dry ground no longer slipping under players' feet. When dribbling through traffic, players can also dodge obstacles more realistically. FIFA 22 continues the club's journey into a bigger and better game, with more customisable characters, player attributes and more. Players can now share their emotions with a single word and demonstrate a
