Reviewing the psychoactive drugs. The review of psychoactive drugs includes drugs that modulate neurotransmitter function at both pre- and postsynaptic levels, neuroendocrine agents, drugs that influence nociceptive neuronal transmission, and drugs that affect the GABA and dopamine (DA) receptor systems. Briefly, medications which are thought to influence a single neurotransmitter system are reviewed, followed by the other neurochemical systems. The drugs are then divided into those that affect serotonin (5HT) receptors (serotonergic agents), those that affect catecholamine (CA) receptors (norepinephrine) and acetylcholine receptors, those that interact with opioid receptors (opioids), and finally the agents that affect gamma-aminobutyric acid (GABA)-mediated transmission (GABA agents), and those that affect the DA system. The latter includes the drugs which influence DA itself, the drugs that influence dopamine autoreceptors, the drugs that influence DA receptor-mediated postsynaptic transmission, and the drugs that influence D1- and D2-type receptors.

Q: Looping through product tags in woocommerce I am currently looking to create a list of drop down boxes containing a list of tags under the 'product tags' tab on the edit product page. I am trying to display tags as a list of checkboxes in the following format [tags1][tags2][tags3]...[tagsn] And would like to keep the numbers in a place to be able to create a loop that automatically calculates the totals. I am not sure how to go about this. Any ideas would be appreciated.

A: By the way, you should simplify your question by giving more details, what do you want to achieve, maybe we can understand better. Ok, I answer now: you can create a was used to assess the cost-effectiveness of each intervention option. This decision analysis aimed to inform discussions with HCPs about the cost-effectiveness of their best option for treatment of mild lower-limb osteopenia. For the hip, the best policy is to wait for monitoring in primary care, since it seems that cost-effective diagnostic testing (i.e. DXA, osteoporosis medication) has potential for preventing the occurrence of osteoporotic fractures. Therefore, whereas most healthcare professionals in the cost-effectiveness model would recommend the strategy of waiting for monitoring, the result from the decision analysis suggests that for a person with a 10% risk of hip fracture, the intervention with DXA or osteoporosis medication should be the best option. Such a policy will always be more cost-effective than waiting for monitoring. For a person at the same risk of hip fracture, the QALY gained with DXA would almost certainly be cost-effective compared with osteoporosis medication (largely because of the lower cost of DXA relative to osteoporosis medication) and the expected QALYs gained with osteoporosis medication would be very high. With respect to the low-energy fractures at the knee and wrist, the decision analysis demonstrates that the management in primary care is the best option, since the expected number of fractures prevented is very high and the intervention is cost-effective. For the person with a 25% risk of having a fracture at the knee or a 50% risk of having a fracture at the wrist, osteoporosis medication may be cost-effective or more cost-effective than the intervention based on DXA; but for a person at a higher risk, e.g. with a 35% risk of fracture at the knee or a 65% risk of fracture at the wrist, DXA would be more cost-effective than medication. This is likely to be because DXA is less costly than medication. The above conclusions are based on UK resource use estimates, and are liable to revision with locally available data. However, the analysis provides an estimate of the likely cost-effectiveness of the options for management of osteopenia; it does not inform the choice of the best option, because this is highly dependent on individual factors. For example, the findings above relate to a group of older women with osteopenia of the hip. The analysis does not include the costs of DXA equipment, which is the most expensive part
