The Obama administration is considering moving its remaining nuclear weapons to a smaller, less expensive facility in Illinois, according to U.S. officials who spoke on condition of anonymity because they were not authorized to discuss a sensitive national security issue. In private meetings with Republican and Democratic lawmakers in the fall, senior officials in the Defense Department advised several lawmakers that the move was under way and would be completed by 2017, the officials said. Congressional aides confirmed the talks and sought comment from the White House. Current plans call for the B61 nuclear weapons to be shipped to a site in southern Illinois beginning in 2015, the officials said. That plan is still under review by the White House and has not yet been approved by President Barack Obama. White House spokesman Jay Carney said Thursday that the administration will not comment on whether or not the warheads would move to Illinois before a final decision is made. "There is a process in place for the United States to move nuclear weapons," Carney said. "There was no decision by the White House on this move." The officials said they were not aware of any U.S. plans to remove them and did not know what would happen to the stockpile after they are moved. The move is opposed by many in Illinois, where some military officials said the proposed facility would be a monument to government failure. "That type of post needs to be a completely new, custom built facility," said Joseph Tomaselli, a retired Col. at
