From the Monero team, to miners, and developers, all seem to be standing shoulder to shoulder. The 2 year old project has a lot to offer, with teams at the highest levels of expertise in certain areas. What may seem like a controversial topic for a technology project, is of vital importance to every development. The number of transactions a blockchain network can support has a direct impact on the speed of transactions, as well as the cost and time involved with them. Currently, Monero operates on the BitMonero protocol, which currently has a 2MB cap on its block size, which is capped at around 5 transactions per second. The debate, started when the original proposal for the Monero ecosystem was to try to push the cap to the industry's next generation technology, PoS. PoS involves a proof-of-stake protocol, where users with more funds are selected to validate the new blocks being added, and carry out the blockchain functions. Thus, once the higher cost of PoS blocks is added onto the current cost of the Monero block, the cost may be unacceptable, considering the value of the Monero market. To make matters more complicated, if the scalability issue is solved, a full transition to PoS could take years, and leave Monero vulnerable to other solutions, like BFT. The cost of b7e8fdf5c8

The consultations were part of the Tobacco Control Initiative to Address Inuit Health and contributed to the Development of an Inuit Health Action Plan (IHAP) that will be used to guide the tobacco control efforts of the Northern Manitoba Health Region. "The consultations have provided us with valuable information about the real challenges that Inuit smokers are facing," says regional Health Officer, Dr. Marie Wettlaufer. "We know that many of them have a hard time accessing treatment programs that are not culturally appropriate and some have physical and other issues that make it difficult to quit and stay quit." Participants from various First Nations communities, including Kuujuaq and Gros Morne in Quebec, Akitsiraq Kujut in Nunavut, Ekiu from Pelly Bay in the Northwest Territories and Baffin Island in Nunavut all heard about the real problems that Inuit face when trying to quit or avoid starting to smoke. Some participants also felt that there are regional and national issues that must be addressed in order to help address the smoking and health problem. "The challenges to all Inuit who smoke are not just cultural or physical but also include individual, household and community factors that should be addressed," says Dr. Wettlaufer. "The IHAP has identified a number of key recommendations that the region is working on implementing. We intend to move quickly on these recommendations once the iHAP is finalised and it is our hope that these community consultations will help inform our plans." Preliminary research that the Tobacco Control Initiative is currently conducting among Inuit communities in the region will also be used to plan for the future.
