Bio-absorbable hydrogels and nanoparticles can be used for sustained delivery of therapeutic cargoes. While such carrier systems have the benefit of prolonged therapeutic drug delivery, the delivery system tends to degrade very slowly. In addition, the release profiles are relatively heterogeneous, and are dependent on the drug type and the delivery vehicle. The degradation of the carrier or the loss of its integrity can result in premature release of the therapeutic cargo, uncontrolled release of the therapeutic cargo, or even uncontrolled uptake of the therapeutic cargo by the body and may, therefore, cause serious side effects. In addition, the bio-degradable carrier or its degradation products, such as acidic hydrogels or acid-labile nanoparticles, cause undesired inflammatory responses in the body. This problem is compounded by the fact that the therapeutic cargo is generally hydrophilic, and thus is easily released in the absence of any sustained delivery system, requiring an increased dosage, which leads to greater side effects. Biodegradable polypeptides are potentially useful for such targeted and sustained delivery of therapeutic cargoes. However, in vivo stability of biodegradable polypeptides has been a great challenge since the highly permeable endothelial barriers of the blood-brain barrier and the blood-ret
