I know what you're thinking. Isn't FIFA stupid enough already? Never mind that almost every major football sport has some sort of motion capture these days (NBA, NHL, UFC, etc), this is just the latest version of a video game series known for its advanced physics system that makes FIFA so much fun. Let's talk physics! FIFA 19 was the first FIFA game in a while to introduce new physics. It mostly focused on the new touches you can add to the game. For example, FK kept the standard, "add a shirt and crease." But FK also introduced another physics feature known as elasto-kinematic (EK) agents. Basically, EK agents are a kind of friction. They are used to analyze the "quality" of the tackle and keep the ball on the player. Instead of only changing the way the ball naturally rolls, it now also changes the way that the player moves after contact. The most obvious example is the "body weight" of the player. If you fall to the ground, your body weight is decreased. So if you get tackled, you no longer move like a 70-year-old man after you lose an arm. FIFA 20 also added physics to tackles, but with a unique twist. Instead of an automatic tackle, tackles will now occur based on what is determined to be the best method of the EK system. EK was a huge part of FIFA 19, with over 85% of all decisions being "controlled" by the computer and about 15% of each player's impact being determined by the quality of the EK in a tackle. It's not just tackles. While FIFA 18 focused on the touches that affect the ball, FIFA 19 introduced "elasticity." A lot of the feeling and the satisfaction of the ball on the foot after a shot, dribble, or pass is determined by a specific property of the ball called the "elasticity." Now, you might be thinking: Why doesn't FIFA just keep making the exact same game over and over again, as they have with each iteration of the series? Why give new players something new? That's a good question. And it's a question that EA Sports is trying to answer. EA Sports

Key Game Features

Q: Can a timeout be canceled? I am not sure if this is possible, but I was thinking about it and it made me think. When a timeout has been created for a socket: `socket.setSoTimeout(600000)` Is the socket automatically closed when the timeout occurs (ie. After 1 hour)? I would assume that it would, so I was wondering if there is any way to cancel or reset the timer? I could re-initialize the socket if this is possible? A: If you use the default implementation of `setSoTimeout()` on Sun/Oracle's JVM, you can't cancel the timer. It's not clear how Oracle implements that method, but it seems clear that after the call to `setSoTimeout()` the socket is no longer usable. You can always read-close it, but once a read completes, you can never start another read. I'm pretty sure there's no way to cancel a `setSoTimeout()`.

Q: IE10 service error on Silverlight 4.0.2 application I have a Silverlight 4.0.2 application that also contains a .NET 4.0 application. For the past week I've been seeing the following error in IE10 "Error code 0x80040111. Service Error. Installation of the Silverlight run-time
