Cryosurgical treatment of onychomycosis. Cryosurgical treatment of onychomycosis has proven useful in a variety of clinical settings. The ability to freeze a number of tissues combined with the potential for repeat treatments may make it a particularly useful modality in this disorder. A questionnaire was mailed to Canadian clinicians to assess the application and results of cryosurgical treatment of onychomycosis, as well as to discover any potentially useful variations in technique. A response rate of 75% from 72 orthopaedists and other clinicians indicated that 34% of the respondents treated onychomycosis, and 78% of those who did not treat onychomycosis indicated that they planned to treat the condition in the future. The most common etiologic agent was Fusarium (67%), followed by Trichophyton (19%), Candida (15%), and Geotrichum (10%). The cost of the procedure and the usual requirement for two treatment sessions per affected digit appeared to be the main factors in declining application. Cryosurgical treatment of onychomycosis was considered a safe, effective, and simple method of treatment for toenails and fingernails. Reported success rates were high, and the response to treatment was favorable among most subjects who completed the questionnaire. However, the use of cryosurgery in onychomycosis appears to be declining, perhaps because of the reduced incidence of onychomycosis in general.The Internet's fastest growing Social Network One of the most appreciated features of social networking sites are their extremely low entry barriers.
