In frogs adapted to the lower temperature, the level of total and free testosterone in males is lower than in the normal animals. On the contrary, the levels of 17-OH progesterone and testosterone-binding capacity in males are higher. The 17-OH-progesterone level in females was higher than in the normal animals. The correlation coefficients between the levels of hormones under study and temperature were calculated. The data indicated that the increase of the temperature in stressed animals would cause the increase of the testosterone level.
