procedural. into a living nightmare firsthand in order to discover the story of Henrietta Kedward,.At a recent Siggraph event, I was approached by two gentlemen. One was none other than the father of video game development, Alex Horwitz, or as we know him, the guy who helped design the adventures of Super Mario and The Legend of Zelda. The other was Steven Politz, or as we know him, best known as one of the designers of Tim Schafer's Double Fine Productions. Alex is a titan of the industry, in both a literal sense and a figurative sense, and here at Go Home's, we're always eager to talk to those who helped create the medium we love so dearly. In this case, we were able to talk for quite a long time with the two gentlemen about their time together, the state of the industry today and a bit of the potential future. With the first question, I started by asking the important one: what was it like working with Alex? Steve Politz: It was great. We're really good friends and we respect each other. We know what we bring to the table. We're not competing with each other. Alex: We're on the same side, really. Politz: Yeah, he's really good at taking care of artists. Alex: It's really great to be able to get a vision down and be on the same page at the same time. We have the ability
