This is the problem: I have a first class called Property. This class has a method called property_id to retrieve the ID of a property from the database. In my controller I have a second class called PropertyController. This class contains the method like_id and puts it's argument in params. Now comes the problem, Ruby says that the method is missing. If I do def like_id(like) #code end I receive "NoMethodError (undefined method `like_id' for #):" Why is it that I can not use the parameter as an identifier? A: When you access an instance variable in the context of a method, it's called a receiver. The receiver's variables will be available to the method via the instance variable. So, when you do like.property_id, you're calling the property_id method, which returns a value, and then you're passing the value of that method (123) to like_id. But when you pass like_id the value 123, it doesn't know how to resolve that to an instance of Property, so it says "there's no method with an identifier like that."

You can call the method directly as such: like.property_id 123

Q: Making a music player in python I am trying to make a music player in python that can play and pause different songs at the same time. I am using PyGame and MusicPlayer. Here is my code so far: import pygame import MusicPlayer musicPath = ('music/track1.mp3') def play(handle, songTitle): handle.

and quality of life outcomes from new and used oral anticoagulants. Oral anticoagulant therapy is most often prescribed to those at risk of atrial fibrillation-related stroke. Some patients discontinue therapy within 4 years of starting because they are not sufficiently protected. We aimed to determine whether new and used (experienced) anticoagulants are associated with the same absolute benefits in quality of life. Patients without major bleeding (major or nonmajor) were followed for 12 months with oral anticoagulant treatment. Time in therapeutic range was recorded. An estimate of quality of life was derived using the Short Form-36 (SF-36) questionnaire. For the SF-36, higher scores indicate better quality of life. For warfarin-naive patients, no meaningful differences were found between treatment options with respect to quality of life outcomes, including the effect of time in therapeutic range.
Compared to warfarin-naive patients, patients who had previous warfarin treatment had lower quality of life scores, although differences were not large. Patients taking newly-approved anticoagulant treatments had the same quality of life outcomes as warfarin-naive patients, although those on apixaban or rivaroxaban were significantly less likely to be in the high-quality range (adjusted odds ratio 0.52,  $P =$ 0.007 and 0.50,  $P = 0.02$ , respectively). Patients who had previously used warfarin treatment had significantly lower quality of life than warfarin-naive patients. Moreover, higher quality of life was associated with time in therapeutic range for these patients ( $P = 0.0014$ ). For anticoagulant-naive patients, quality of life outcomes are similar from new and
