Clinton's 'perfumed princes,' the Kochs and a new book 'The Company,' written by John Nichols It's no secret the Koch Brothers and their associated tentacles have a huge part in funding anti-labor and pro-right-wing libertarian organizations. What may not be obvious, however, is that the Kochs also pay significant attention to what's going on in and around the Democratic Party. The influence of labor unions, especially the AFL-CIO, has atrophied over the decades, but a new book by two reporters with the Washington Post, "The Company: A cop's-eye view of corporate America," shows how the Kochs have infiltrated the business elite. It's a big picture view, and there are plenty of examples of the Kochs' efforts to reverse the tide of their presence inside the Democratic Party, which is surprising, given the supposed affinity for what are considered

"corporate" roles. For example: "At a retreat of top management of Koch Industries, a two-day discussion of 'dual party preference' concluded with consensus that the Kochs should be positioning themselves as a 'party to a shared agenda'" "The Kochs figured out how to hedge their bets. They were both helpful and influential in presidential politics and willing to spend well over $1 million on Democratic candidates and causes. In 2004, for instance, the Kochs paid for an outreach program for George W. Bush's 2004 reelection campaign, headlined with the slogan 'Where Have all the Moderates Gone?.'" But there is a sense of overlap in the stories told in the book. There is the example of the Kochs and their allies getting involved in the behind-the-scenes push for the passage of NAFTA, helping to persuade unions

To create the application for 8" screens (including Universal Windows apps), you have to create different windows for the two different screen sizes. The PCs that we use to do our jobs today are out of date. For years, the big five or six OEMs have provided only two or three screen sizes, often with only one resolution each. That's a terrible way to serve the needs of users, and it's become a very real handicap for creative professionals who need access to computer screens of various sizes. We want to change that. We want to bring an era of uniformity to PC display sizes, and to get us there, we'll need the help of you, the hundreds of thousands of people who have already bought a PC with a certain screen size. You, our users, are critical for a successful outcome, because you are the reason that consumers have embraced a certain screen size as their favorite, and we will need your input and validation to make it happen. For a long time, we've been using 2:1 user studies to get feedback from real users, and we have been very successful at it. However, we are now at a crossroads. On one hand, we want to expand our user studies to be sure that we are delivering the optimal user experience. This will help us make the right design choices for the actual market, and we can't do that if we don't know what's working and what's not. On the other hand, we want to do more research, in particular with creative professionals.

It's one
