The American Society of Clinical Oncology (ASCO) and the Association of Molecular Pathology (AMP) recommend the integration of biomarkers into novel diagnostics and/or therapeutic approaches of prostate cancer. The values of several biomarkers have been described in prostate cancer screening and risk classification and are based on a combination of several clinical parameters and such biochemical markers as levels of prostate-specific antigen (PSA), free PSA, and the ratio of free to total PSA. Although PSA has long been the most frequently used biomarker for prostate cancer, there is no consensus on either a standard or recommended cutoff value for the PSA concentration level for prostate cancer detection. Therefore, the 2013 ASGBC guidelines for the use of biomarkers in the screening, diagnosis, prognosis, and surveillance of prostate cancer recommend that the cutoffs for PSA levels be set at different ranges for different patient populations, that the ratios of free to total PSA be used in the diagnosis of prostatic intraepithelial neoplasia (PIN), that total PSA levels be measured in a time interval relative to the start of the day, and that clinical-grade free PSA methods be used for absolute quantification of PSA and that the free to total PSA ratio be used to evaluate the clinical relevance of a PSA level based on a time interval for analysis, given the greater day-to-day variability of free PSA. In addition, the guidelines recommend that the values of the PSA-related biomarkers be set at different ranges for different patient populations, using specific percentiles for different patients with prostate cancer. It is recommended that the threshold of free-to-total PSA ratio be set at
