

Superman Gifs for Facebook Lne Posts, Greetings, Q: Replacement for large volume spring water I have a watering system that uses a very large (approximately 5,000-liter) tank that is filled via gravity to be used for a variety of plants. A pump is used to fill this tank, but I'm at a point where the tank is so large that the pump is large enough as well, and I'm finding that I need to find a cheaper and/or more efficient solution to my watering needs. Is there a type of tank where I can pour the incoming water into? I have a weak memory on this, but I'm also not an expert on this industry (will be a new job so I'm still getting used to the mechanics). Has anyone found a solution to a similar problem? A: At a quick glance, you seem to be describing a rainwater catchment system. There are a lot of different designs, and I'm not familiar with any of them, but let's go with the most basic version for the sake of discussion. One option is to design a tank large enough to hold all the water you wish to collect, and another tank (or cistern) that holds the water to be collected in the first tank. A pipe leads from the first tank to the second tank, and the water level in the first tank is equal to the pipe level, and the pipe level in the second tank is equal to the first tank's full level. At the top of the second tank, there's a water outlet and a pump to pump the water to your plant. As far as specific solutions go, without knowing the exact size and design of the tanks, I can only give you broad ranges. It's probably not worth re-plumbing an entire system to fit a single small tank. The tank design and placement becomes more important if the water has to be held in a tank that can't be otherwise occupied. If the water can be in another tank, such as the main storage tank of a well-water supply system, then you might be able to use a larger tank. The only other recommendation I can make would be to do some research. You'll be amazed at what's out there! It's much easier these days to find advice about gardening than it used to be; there's been a steep decline in gardening media outlets in recent decades. 1cdb36666d
