Giant cell tumor of the tendon sheath in the wrist: a rare complication after Bennett's fracture and following Harrington rod implantation for distal radial fractures. Giant cell tumors of the tendon sheath are not uncommon, but are often benign. The purpose of this report is to describe a case of a giant cell tumor of the tendon sheath of the wrist that occurred a year following distal radial fracture stabilization with a Harrington rod and subsequently progressed into a painful mass. Gross, section, and immunohistochemical examination of a biopsy specimen were performed. Grossly, a lesion composed of sheets and nodules of large, round, or oval cells ranging from 2 to 10 mm in diameter was seen. Sections disclosed a cellular lesion composed of nests and cords of large, round to oval cells that varied in size from 20 to 90 microns in diameter. These cells had distinct lacunae that varied in size from 60 to 250 microns in diameter. The cells lacked cytological atypia, mitoses, hemorrhage or necrosis. Positive immunohistochemical stains included periodic acid-Schiff/diastase, vimentin, and CD68. The diagnosis of giant cell tumor of the tendon sheath of the wrist was confirmed. This is a rare but recognized complication of treatment of distal radial fractures with a Harrington rod.Q: How to resolve NavMesh intersection errors? I am having some trouble trying to resolve the NavMesh intersection error that I get when I use the Autodesk NavMesh tools, specifically the 3D points to 3D planes in the workspace. I am using build 186.10. I made sure that my NavMeshBuilder is created from a planet or solar system which is of the correct size (13.38 x 13.38 x 12.0 km). The point I am talking about is the red check marker in the picture below, on the island visible in the bottom left. It is at the edge of the hill. The NavMeshBuildLayer is a hill. The NavMeshBuildLayer is a mountain. I have tried to uncheck and check around the regions of the island in the Viewport in order to see which parts or regions are causing issues. I then tried to place the labels of the different regions in order to see which label is behind the point of intersection and which is before the intersection. I tried to experiment with the size of the island in order to make sure that

David Kaye is director of the free expression group Reporters Without Borders in India, and author of "Embedded Surveillance: U.S. Military Spying and the Law in the Post-9/11 Era." The opinions expressed in this commentary are his. (CNN) There are two rules in the Constitution's Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act : Agents can't read your email or listen in on your phone calls without a warrant. It doesn't matter how much power the US government has, or how broad its surveillance powers over the populace. And it does matter whether there is a warrant, because that's what the government must give anyone who it wants to listen in on an American's communications. It's about proportionality. When the US government intercepts American communications, it's probably not actually listening to the words of the people with whom they're communicating, although that doesn't mean there are no abuses of power here. But it is looking for records of who is communicating with whom and for what, for example, "supporting terrorism" and "preparations for terrorism." This is a challenge to the Intelligence Community, which has grown since 9/11 from 13,000 people to more than 60,000. But, unlike previous terrorist threats, it's the CIA that faces a much tougher challenge than the others. Given that the US intelligence community was responsible for the failure to predict the 9/11 attack, as the 9/11 Commission Report found, it's more important than ever to rely on trust, not just on their technical capabilities. For that reason, the US intelligence community has demonstrated some restraint. When they want to monitor Americans, they get a warrant, and if they don't get one, they have no ability to listen in. What the US intelligence community can do, however, is create vast databases of communication that are ostensibly not accessible to the US government, and then use technology to track who was communicating with whom. It's somewhat creepy, and it's something that people should be concerned about. David Kaye The law changed in 2008, when Section 702 of FISA was re-authorized. The intelligence community's standards for surveillance are pretty high. The President requires an attorney general's warrant for spying on Americans. The law requires the attorney general to tell the Director of National Intelligence about anything that might present a national security risk. And if there are conversations that are of value to the intelligence community, the attorney
